In the AV·BJ scene, for adult performers who reveal their vaginas, the vagina emerges as a self-possessed subject rather than an object. They render their vaginas as publicly legible as their faces. Within this world, the vagina appears as routinely as a face—it is the performer herself enacting a public claim to vaginal subjectivity.

It is an unconscious modality of corporeal resistance, liberating what was once concealed by social regulation and capitalist repression. In practice, vulva close-ups in AV·BJ function equivalently to facial close-ups: they transmit emotion. The vagina becomes a bearer of essence, presence, selfhood, subjectivity, authenticity, identity and bodily dignity—a site where her other face, her SECOND FACE, is inscribed.

From the perspective of film/video studies, the vagina frequently orchestrates the movement and narrative architecture of the frame. In adult BJ broadcasting and first-person POV AV, the camera follows the will of the vagina's owner rather than directorial instruction. Metaphorically, a vaginal close-up becomes a mode of self-inscribed cinema authored by the performer herself. The vagina is not merely a filmed object but the protagonist of the scene—the element that leads and organizes the narrative. What governs the video is not an external cameraman but the vagina itself as the decisive—the anatomical axis—key frame. It operates as a commanding, narrative-driving agent within the media environment.

In front of the camera, the vagina is no longer an object; it is the most unmediated speaking subject and the center of the gaze that objectifies the viewer. When the camera zooms in on the vagina, the gaze originates from the vagina itself, and the viewer becomes the one who receives that gaze. Viewers respond to this gaze by masturbating, posting praise in the comments, and sending monetary support. The bidirectional economy formed between the pussy and its many spectators offers ordinary women an immediate, transparent, and appealing reward system for pussy performance. The convergence of modern technologies—close-up capability, narrative framing, and economic interactivity—transforms the vagina into a subject. This marks a radical inversion of the gaze economy and a reallocation of sexual agency.
